

4 Reasons Employees Need Better Legal Benefits Now

You're a people person. That's why you work in HR. You see and hear firsthand the needs of the employees who depend on you and your team to be an ally in difficult times. This past year was like no other, with last minute operational shifts, employees working from home, and HR teams scrambling to adjust to new routines and priorities.

These shifts in both business operations and personal activities and preferences have underscored the importance of digital solutions for what used to be routine, in-person transactions. You were likely right in the middle of figuring out how to transact HR business in a 100% remote capacity. On a personal level, employees were too.

COVID-19 has upended many of our lives in a way that highlights the need for enhanced legal benefits — for a number of reasons.

To start, many employees may have experienced turbulence in their employment - whether that was in the form of a layoff, furlough or even increased expectations around their workload as their former colleague's tasks were assigned to them. A demonstration of appreciation, investment and commitment in the form of enhanced benefits from an employer can go a long way towards making these employees feel more secure and like their challenges are understood and recognized.

Beyond the workplace, COVID-19 may have highlighted legal needs in our personal lives that weren't as apparent or salient before—like warranties, wills, protection against identity theft, and contract explanations.

While many people may opt into their insurance legal benefits, it's often not robust, engaging, or user-friendly enough to garner multiple visits—and after all, benefits are there to be used. A modern legal benefit—one that incorporates on-demand customization, mobile-friendly experiences, and hands-on support—is far more aligned with the future of work.

From speeding tickets to starting a family, employees need a modern legal benefit now—one that meets employees where they are with relevant and affordable solutions that make legal simple. Here's why.

1 Employees are feeling squeezed between elder and childcare responsibilities—they need solutions that can make this easier.

The “Sandwich Generation” is expanding. As Baby Boomers age, their children are often caught in the middle—caring for their parents even as they care for their children. It's a lot of pressure, both emotionally and financially.

According to Pew Research, over 26 million young adults lived with their parents as of July 2020, an increase of 2.6 million from the previous February and the highest percentage, at 52%, ever measured. Before COVID-19 upended our lives, older generations were also moving back in with their adult children, with 14% surveyed by Pew Research in 2017 indicating they lived with their adult child, up from 7% in 1995. Even as we exit the pandemic and life returns to normal(ish), the disruption continues to reverberate in interesting ways.

Caregiving is a central part of the sandwich predicament. According to a January 2021 Harris Poll survey of 2,000 adults, conducted on behalf of the nonprofit Generations United, about 26% of Americans were living in households with at least three generations. That's up from 7% in 2011. The survey also found that 57% of those living in multigenerational households began doing so during the pandemic. Of those living in multigenerational households, 34% cited the need for eldercare, 34% for childcare, and 30% due to job loss, change in job status, or underemployment.

While the benefits of multigenerational living are many, caregiving responsibilities can get complicated. Employees who are now caring for elderly family members or young children in their homes might need Authorization and Consent documents to either have or grant legal caregiving authority. Child Care, Elder Care, and Medical Treatment Authorization documents are essential legal tools that provide caregivers with the authority to take action and make decisions in the moment.

While Prenuptial Agreements have been reported as being on the rise amongst Millennials, they are still largely underutilized. The stigma and expense of putting one together can lead to fear and hard feelings. Having access to multiple options for creating a Prenuptial Agreement eases the stress of negotiating the terms by putting control of the process directly into the hands of the couple. Bringing in a lawyer is an affordable option that is available at any time during the process, and the entire experience is available on mobile devices. This tech-driven approach eliminates barriers that keep people from creating simple legal documents and paves the way for higher engagement with employer-provided legal benefits.

3 Employees need easy access to legal help around life events—not a confusing and difficult back-and-forth with insurance.

Both legal insurance and legal software offer access to and resolution of life events. These life events often lead to the need to consult with legal experts for guidance. The question is, how much guidance is needed and how much friction is involved?

Legal insurance is fundamentally difficult to use. Employees must first opt in to receive benefits and then must qualify for coverage. Legal issues that arise unexpectedly and are not covered can lead to time-consuming and aggravating communications with the insurer. It can also lead to disappointment with the benefit. While this model has been used for decades, with enrollment rates hovering around 5%, there is a big gap between enrollment and engagement.

Insurance is not designed nor intended to feature high levels of engagement or reuse. This has been the domain of software, and in our case, legal software. By covering all employees, not just those who opt in to a plan, and creating a modern software experience that generates high levels of satisfaction and return visits, legal technologies have flipped the insurance model on its head. And more importantly, for those HR teams offering legal insurance, legal software can often ride alongside legal insurance and employees can find benefit in both options.
